"I was late doing my homework because my freezer wouldn't turn off. It just wouldn't stop pouring out ice. Soon the apartment was so cold that our pet parrot froze solid in flight. Then, when I tried to boil water on the stove, the bubbles froze in the pot."

According to Carolyn S. Brown in The Tall Tale in American Folklore and Literature, a tall tale is a fictional story which is told in the form of personal narrative or anecdotes, exaggerated details.

When we think of tall tales, we usually think of the ones that were told in the United States by the settlers and pioneers, although people told tall tales in all countries.

At first, tall tales spread by word of mouth, just like fables. Also, most of the heroes were common people, not kings, presidents, and rich people. Later, they were written down, similar to fairy tales, and there are books of tall tales.

Comparable to myths, people told tall tales to connect to their community, traditions and land. Tall tales were told so people would remember their heroes. Like the fairy tales, the main characters in tall tales were people that inspired their community to do great things. Many of these characters were real people who actually lived in the United States and were famous in
